Tweet: .@RyanDEnos argues the Democratic coalition is not stable as college-educated white's interests diverge from the rest of their working class coalition. @Edsall

Summary: College-educated whites, especially those with higher incomes, are not clear coalitional partners for anyone — they don't favor economic policies, such as increasing housing supply or even higher taxes on the rich, that are beneficial to the working class, of any race. And many college-educated whites are motivated by social issues that are also not largely supported by the working class, of any race. It's not clear that, with their current ideological positions, socially liberal and economically centrist or rightist college-educated whites are natural coalition partners with anybody but themselves. My sense is that much of the college-educated liberal political rhetoric is focused on social signaling to satisfy their own psychological needs and improve their social standing with other college-educated liberals, rather than policies that would actually reduce racial gaps in economic well-being, civil rights protections, and other quality of life issues.
