Tweet: According to a @markets analysis, several major Western economies including Germany, France, the UK, and Canada have seen their per-capita GDP shrink over the last two quarters, driven by housing prices and a rise in less productive service jobs.

Summary: For decades, the rapid inflow of migrants helped countries including Canada, Australia, and the UK stave off the demographic drag from aging populations and falling birth rates. That's now breaking down as a surge of arrivals since borders reopened after the pandemic runs headlong into a chronic shortage of homes to accommodate them. All up, thirteen economies across the developed world were in per-capita recessions at the end of last year, according to exclusive analysis by Bloomberg Economics. While there are other factors — such as the shift to less-productive service jobs and the fact that new arrivals typically earn less — housing shortages and associated cost-of-living strains are a common thread.
