Tweet: India's military has started high-level planning for how India would manage a Taiwan contingency; ranging from serving as a logistics hub to opening a new theater of war along the India-China border.

Summary: Defense Chief General Anil Chauhan — India's top military commander — commissioned a study to examine the wider impact of any war over the island that also involves the US and its allies, and what action India could take in response. One option the Indian military will study involves serving as a logistics hub to provide repair and maintenance facilities for allied warships and aircraft, as well as food, fuel and medical equipment for armies resisting China. A more extreme scenario would assess the potential for India to get directly involved along their northern border, opening a new theater of war for China. While no deadline has been set to complete the study, the Indian military is under orders to finish it as soon as possible, one of the officials said.
