

Macro Roundup Article

Headline: The Shape Of Polarization in America

Article Link: <https://patrickruffini.substack.com/p/the-shape-of-polarization-in-america>

Author(s)	Patrick Ruffini
Publication	The Intersection
Publication Date	March 23, 2023

Tweet: Citing data from Echelon Insights @PatrickRuffini argues political polarization is largely a white phenomenon particularly pronounced across college graduates and non-college republicans.

Summary: Here, we're measuring policy views on a granular 0-100 scale based on how people answered more than 50 different policy questions on the 2020 CES. A score of 100 means that one gave the most conservative possible answer on all questions, and a score of zero would mean the same thing for the most liberal possible answer. The index itself was calibrated to reflect a rough 50-50 balance between right- and left-leaning voters, reflecting the reality of a closely divided politics. The original questions selected by the academic team behind the CES tended to yield more liberal-leaning responses. In spite of that, the CES is a very good survey for this kind of analysis, with 60,000 interviews that allow for robust subgroup analysis. Another way to boil this down is to bucket people into different ideological camps based on a 75-percent cutoff for ideological consistency. So, giving the conservative or liberal answer more than 75 percent of the time places you in each of those camps. Otherwise, you're in a non-ideological middle ground. The 75 percent cutoff is an important one. Above we find Assad-like margins for Donald Trump or Joe Biden in 2020 of more than 98 percent. If you're above this threshold, you're not persuadable in the slightest. In the middle, your vote is basically up-for-grabs, progressing from one candidate to other in sliding scale fashion according to your policy views.

Primary Topic: Politics

Topics: Op-Ed/Blog Post, Politics, Quote

Permalink: <https://www.edwardconard.com/macro-roundup/citing-data-from-echelon-insights-patrickruffini-argues-political-polarization-is-largely-a-white-phenomenon-particularly-pronounced-across-college-graduates-and-non-college-republicans?view=detail>

Featured Image Link: <https://www.edwardconard.com/wp-content/uploads/2023/03/Ideological-Category-By-Race-.jpg>