Tweet: Charlie Munger warns that investors should expect lower returns going forward. Adding he and Buffett were “creature[s] of a particular time and a perfect set of opportunities...[We lived in] a perfect period to be a common stock investor.”

Summary: Berkshire has generated compounded annual returns of nearly 20 percent, twice the rate of the benchmark S&P 500 stock index, since 1965. “We were a creature of a particular time and a perfect set of opportunities,” said Munger, adding that he had lived during “a perfect period to be a common stock investor”. He and Buffett had benefited “by and large [from] low interest rates, low equity values, ample opportunities”, he said. Munger warned that the golden age for investing was over, and investors would need to contend with a period of lower returns. “It’s gotten very tough to have anything like the returns that were obtained in the past,” he said, pointing to higher interest rates and a crowded field of investors chasing bargains and looking for companies with inefficiencies.
