Tweet: CBP data show border encounters fell from 300,000 in December to about 190,000 monthly in the first four months of 2024 after Mexico stepped up enforcement measures.

Summary: The number of encounters between migrants and immigration authorities during the first four months of this year is down 40% compared with the final four months of last year, according to senior administration officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified. The decline implies that the number of arrivals by undocumented migrants has continued to slide from March into April, the first time during the Biden administration that the figures slowed during that span despite warmer weather, when the figures would typically rise. Customs and Border Protection data show that border encounters fell to about 190,000 per month in February and March, down from a record of more than 300,000 in December, after Mexico restored funding for migration services and ramped up deportations.
