Tweet: Nicholas Eberstadt and Ashton Verderly @AElecon make the case that a “crisis of the Chinese family” is underway. They project by 2050 living parents and in-laws will outnumber children for middle aged Chinese.

Summary: China is now on the cusp of a severe and unavoidable “kin crash,” driven by prolonged sub-replacement fertility. The implosion of consanguineous family networks, by our reckoning, means that China’s rising generations will likely have fewer living relatives than ever before in Chinese history. A “kin famine” will thus unfold unforgivingly over the next 30 years—starting now. As it intensifies, the Chinese family—the most important institution protecting Chinese people against adversity in bad times and helping them seize opportunity in good times—will increasingly falter in both these crucial functions.
