Tweet: .@jmhorp argues the rise in both market and post-tax/transfer income by generation documented by @jefflarrimore @kevincorinth is not driven by the growth of dual-income families.

Summary: One other great thing about this paper is that we can answer the question of whether rising median incomes are driven by the growth of dual-income families. The authors look at total working hours for the household (covering both spouses). The finding is interesting, because it's the reverse of what you often hear: for the Silent Generation and Baby Boomers, part of the increase in household income is from working more hours. But for the more recent generations (Gen X and Millennials), that's not the case: younger households have roughly the same number of working hours as Boomers did during prime working years. Again, here's the authors on this point: "Holding work hours constant, we find that Generation X and Millennials experienced a larger intergenerational increase in market income than Baby Boomers."
